Ok Wizanda, There is too much to that post to address, so I will try a few. John was Elijah, supporting reincarnation. I have pondered that a lot over the years. I think John had some of the essence of Elijah, or that same spirit. When anybody dies, their breath (spirit) returns to God. That breath (spirit) has the life experiences of a person who was born, it is most likely this same breath (spirit) that was in Elijah, was present at John's conception. This does not mean John was Elijah, but did have some of the essence of Elijah, as there is only one John. But this essence, (breath) or (spirit) can be used again, if the times call for it. Does that make sense to you? "dude" from christian links

When Jesus made Adam from the dust, he was a body lying on the ground. God breathed life (breath or spirit) into him and he became a living soul. Our souls are not the spirit which is breath. When man dies, his body returns to the dust, and his soul goes to God, and the soul goes to sleep, awaiting resurrection. So this spirit is not in it, but it is not that person. Each soul is independent of all others and has its own essence as one! That's why Elijah and John are not the same soul, but did share the same spirit. Does that follow this?
