About Knowledge

I am certain beyond a reasonable doubt that I and all that I perceive, exist. However, unreasonable doubt is still doubt, and if it exists in the smallest amount, it is not absolute certainty. All is not as it seems.

There is no part of my anatomy that enables me to be sure that the knowledge I have is factual, though some things do seem more certain than others. We are all in knowledge gained through our own experiences, than in hear-say, or evidence. And, we more eagerly believe information that supports or confirms our own beliefs. In the end, it is only our belief in the accuracy of the source, or means through which the information was obtained, that separates that which we perceive as accurate from that which we perceive as inaccurate or uncertain.

It is all too easy to overemphasize any one part of the greater whole, or to claim one view is superior to another's. Seek not to compete with the views of others, but to find a proper perspective within the grand scheme. Not to say there are no absolute truths, but the majority of notions overall, do hold merit to some degree.

Knowing is not a prerequisite to understanding. There will always be those who know, but for the time it takes to prove one thing conclusively, hundreds of things are unknown.
