Joel 2:30-31 says it will go blood red before the day of the Lord.

Now It's Certain: The Supergiant Star Betelgeuse WILL Explode

Posted by Cristian Antonescu

Back in December last year, astronomers have been suspecting that the star Betelgeuse is about to explode. The cosmic object has become much dimmer, even though it was among the brightest stars in the night sky. Being located in the constellation Orion, Betelgeuse will finally face its end and turn into a supernova, according to the latest data gathered by LIGO, the Laser Interferometer Gravitational-Wave Observatory.

Thus, gravitational waves coming from Orion's direction have been detected, which can be caused by a supernova, and as you might have already guessed, scientists are placing their bets on Betelgeuse's explosion.

Betelgeuse's explosion could occur in the next several weeks.

This is one hypothesis claimed by scientists, and among them is Edward Bellamy at Villanova University's Department of Astronomy and Astrophysics. He has been studying Betelgeuse since almost four decades ago, so he might know what he's talking about. It is also possible that Betelgeuse will explode much later, when humanity will have advanced significantly.

What's for sure is that the supergiant star will indeed explode, but we're not sure when it will happen. When it does, the supernova will be visible with the naked eye for several weeks, as bright as several stars on the night sky...
