I probably got off on the wrong foot showing judgment towards the author and apologize for. As for me I am spiritual in nature but do not partake of religion. I believe in God but maybe not in the same sense that others do. My issue is not to support industrial society as the answer. The point I was trying to make was not to judge all of humanity. Society is not all good but also not all bad. Understanding the motivations helps you to bridge the gap for them towards achieving enlightenment. If enough, the author believes that we should all stop thinking and start living. There is no good theory except people have not learned how to control their emotions. Living without taking the time to contemplate your actions leads to impulsive behavior. The industrialized society is the reason or not it does seem as though people are becoming more emotional. I, however, do not necessarily think this is a bad thing. You mentioned an NDE article. Yes, there may come a time when a large part of the population is in an emotional state but this will only be a temporary transition. People are feeling a sense of loss or missing in their life. They want to be happy and compassionate and don't want to be judgmental but they don't know how to separate the two. How to have love without judgment there you have to take a leap into the void. The void of an unemotional state. When you begin to understand the effects emotions have on your spirit good and bad. When you will start to see that it is possible to have love without hate. However, it is a lesson lost for a time. And it will be our job as those who have already made the transition to help them grounded. And this can only happen by allowing people to make their own decisions without judgment over them. Giving them the opportunity to see that happiness is not found in possessions. It is found in the heart. But telling them this truth is only a lesson to gain the understanding. And that my friend is the state of the world today. The lesson many are learning with the opportunity the industrialized society has provided. The author about judging society is two wrongs not making a right and I will not do that within myself why I chose that route. I will have to contemplate how to be judgmental as not to be judgmental about people who are judgmental.
