Ok, I apologize for the length, but to answer the question first: Did man is that simple, even to a person who "believes" in evolution. The scientists together think, based on evidence that is blatant, that man and ape, not ancestry. This in no way hinders a belief in "creationism" or ID.

Second, what we need to realize, in my own humble opinion, is that when a question about the rational/natural world must look to the natural and not spiritual/irrational.

Think of the detective who is confronted with the whodoneit question. Find the murder weapon, the cause of death, anything that seems odd or out of questions the witnesses and anyone involved with the victim looking for a. A good detective will look for signs of lies or half-truths from those he questions. The evidence on the table and decide on the answer.

It is the same way with this question. As I stated, man did not come from evidence or the scientists are saying.

If you will look at the fossil records you will see:

- A. There are no signs of human fossils until X year.
- B. There are signs of ape-like lifeforms at previous Y year.
- C. Early Hominid/"Human" skeletons differ from current hominid skeletons.
- D. We see the use of crafted tools around fossils who are definitely not crafted tools by non-humans.

Now we have a pattern. Now we have an answer. Man most likely evolved from a lifeform simultaneous to the evolving of the apes we see today.

If you want more evidence look at apes and how they live:

- A. They live in primitive tribal communities.
- B. They, the whole tribe, raise each offspring.
- C. They war against neighboring tribes.
- D. Some even go so far as to use tools, though not crafted tools, such as something we thought only humans do.

And we have another pattern. I don't feel like searching for all this stuff on it up, google works. Remember to consider the source and the reasoning behind the source, however. Otherwise google doesn't work.

As words of wisdom: The beginning is as unimportant as the ending. It's the middle that's important, and what you do during the here and now.
