This question has baffled theologians throughout the ages:

A quote by Epicurus shows some of the dilemmas:

'If God is unable to prevent evil, then he is not all-powerful. If God is not all-powerful, then he is not all-good.'

The problem with most people's theories is they start with blaming others. We should look at the meaning of them words, 'satan' means 'an accuser', and 'devil' means 'one who tempts'.

God is the highest morality, at the very top of the dimensions creating the universe. He exists in the first place; so if there wasn't God, there wouldn't be any gods. Without God, there would be no reality, there would just be a random quantum chaos.

Thus if we understood that we're all made from that random quantum chaos, we could formulate it into something where we can grow, that is the meaning of the 'Inclosed Garden' for us to grow within.

Just like a plant will grow in the darkness, to reach towards the light, we do the same - learning from the evils, to want the good, and grow upwardly.

Yet the problem is we're between Heaven & Hell, and as such earth is the middle ground. Below is the darkness, and a few dimensions above us is Heaven... Thus we are in the darkness, as it is energy condensed; where we are animated from above.

So whereas God is trying to lead us to being the best we can be, many of us choose the easier route - which on the highway down to Hell, literally means we are going the wrong way, and to want to seek righteousness to go the right way.

The other problem with people's theorization of what God is, is they start with their own morality, so they personify God, and attach our own morality compass - which is not God's, that discerning in the first place.

God is like a Universal Central Processor (CPU), where if we're all in so many dimensions, the CPU is 100% mathematical creating reality at a quantum level. As time we get down here near Hell, into our lower dimensions, our very nature is to choose the easier route.

When we understand God is more like a processor making a computer game, it is the beings that choose to create evils, and God tries to make us choose the right ways - even using the evil to show us which way to go.
